To Whom It May Concern:

If you are considering Jennifer Warner for a position with your organization, or for admission to your institution of higher learning, I am delighted to report that Jennifer is one of the strongest students I have ever encountered in more than 30 years of teaching English and journalism at Delaware County Community College.

I had the pleasure of getting to know Jennifer when she enrolled in my Fundamentals of Journalism I class during the fall 2020 semester. Immediately, Jennifer impressed me as a very capable writer who was not afraid to get outside her comfort zone and tackle very challenging and interesting assignments.

Despite having little to no experience with newswriting, Jennifer quickly learned the basics and began submitting articles to our college newspaper, The Communitarian. One article in particular, titled "One man's plea for justice," featured an in-depth examination of a death-row inmate's fight for exoneration before he is executed. Jennifer also wrote about indigenous women's role in government, a professor who photographs woodland mushrooms to manage her anxiety, and an editorial about Donald Trump's promotion of dangerous conspiracy theories.

Needless to say, Jennifer earned an "A" in the class.

In her spare time, Jennifer is also the senior editor for Pegasus, the college literary magazine, and president of the Creative Writing Club.

In short, whether you are considering her as a candidate for admission to your school, or for a writer or copy editor position with your organization, you will not be disappointed if you give Jennifer this opportunity. In addition to her work ethic, dedication to her education, and high personal standards in and outside the classroom, Jennifer also possesses the traits of any good writer: she is creative, inquisitive, precise, detail-oriented, able to meet deadlines, and, most importantly, open to constructive criticism.

If there is anything else you need to know about this very worthwhile candidate, please let me know. Since our college has switched to virtual learning, email is the best way to reach me.

Sincerely,

Bonnie McMeans
